

Abstract: In many fields, most researchers are interested in the causal effect of programs on outcomes. However, standard statistical analysis infers correlations among variables, not causal relationships. The regression discontinuity design is a quasi-experimental quantitative method that assesses the causal effect of an intervention by comparing observations that are close to an eligibility threshold. In this talk, I will provide a short lecture on the regression discontinuity designs.